My Experience Making a Website

The first time I made a website, it became one of the most valuable experiences in my life. At that time, I did not know much about coding or web design, so I felt confused and nervous. However, I was very interested in learning how websites are made.

I started learning HTML, CSS, and JavaScript from tutorials and videos on the internet. At first, I only created a simple website with plain colors and basic text. As time went by until now for one year, I kept practicing and improving my skills. I learned how to create responsive designs, add animations, and make websites look more modern and attractive.

During the learning process, I experienced many difficulties. Sometimes my code had errors, the layout looked messy, or some features did not work properly. Even so, I never gave up. I continued practicing and trying new things until I understood how to solve the problems.

Now, after learning web development for one year, I feel more confident in creating websites. I can design better layouts and use different technologies to make my websites more interactive. This experience taught me that success requires patience, consistency, and hard work.
